Poems from Black Africa

In his foreword to Poems From Black Africa (University of Indiana, $4.95), Langston Hughes quotes exiled South African poet-novelist Ezekiel Mphahlele in explaining the different approaches to literature taken by Africans writing in English and French. "English and French writing move along different tracks, particularly in the realm of poetry," Mphahlele is quoted. "The Nigerian poet talks about things as they affect him personally and immediately. He is not protesting or trying to vindicate his blackness. The French-speaking poet, however, particularly of the négritude school, uses broad symbols in which immediacy of individual experience is not the important thing. These are symbols of Africa, of blackness, of what is regarded by the poet as African traits which are expected to be a unifying force—not only for the indigenous people of the continent but for the Negro world in general." It is helpful to keep this in mind while reading the works of the 36 poets from 10 countries included in this volume. There are three main sections in the book. The first, Oral Traditions, contains a collection of poems translated from some 14 local tongues (Bantu, Ibo, Akan, Amharic, etc.) into English. Some of the best of these were translated from the Yoruba by the famed European African scholar Ulla Beier. The second section, and the largest, deals with English-speaking poets ("Lonely," by South African poet Bloke Modisane, first appeared in the November 1962 issue of NEGRO DIGEST). The third section contains works by French-speaking poets, the most notable of which is Senegal's brilliant president Leopold Senghor. There is a welcome section in the back of the book providing biographical notes on all the poets and translators. Mr. Hughes and the University of Indiana Press are to be congratulated for making this worthy volume available.
